Those which may be treated by simpler means will be found considered, with the receipts appropriate for their removal, on pages 365, 366. Diseases of the Hair. The most usual diseases of the hair are falling, eczema, dandruff, also seborrhoea. Falling of the Hair, or alopecia, without obvious reason, generally depends upon want of vigor in the scalp, and can be remedied by stimulating applications. We give, later in this work, the recipes for a number of well-tried hair tonics, which are appropriate in these cases (pp. 363, 364). Eczema of the Scalp. This is shown by a moist, watery discharge on the scalp. It dries up, forms scabs, and mats the hairs together. One form of scald head, in children, is of this nature Its treatment should be that given...
