All who are specially charged with the improvement of classroom practice will testify to the fact. The difficulty is excessive at the present hour because we have arrived at a point where tinkering with the various details of traditional procedure no longer gives a considerable result. Educational reconstruction must be made far reaching if it is really to become effective in a fundamental way. It must greatly extend the range of experiences which the school makes personal to the child and provide a more vital foundation for the acquisition of such skills as are eminently necessary in adult life. The modern program calls for greater vitality and breadth in the education of youth. Success in such an expansion of educational policy involves a radical change in point of view. The needed change in point of view will come more readily if the teacher recognizes the restricted field in which dominant teaching traditions have originated. In function the first...
